Student Learning Outcomes:

Upon successful completion of this course, students will be able to:

1. Make conversions using metric and English units.

2. Describe the fundamental particles of the atom and relate to electronic configuration to the periodic table and ionic/covalent bonding.

3. Write formulas and names of inorganic compounds and give the products of common chemical reactions.

4. Describe the mole and relate the use of it in stoichiometric calculations.

5. Explain solute interactions in an aqueous solution and use molarity and percentage to describe their concentration.

6. Explain the interactions of acids, bases and salts in aqueous solutions and explain the reactions and purpose of a buffer.

7. Name and draw the structures of representative compounds of each class of organic compounds: hydrocarbons, alcohols, amines, ethers, aldehydes, ketones, carboxylic acids and esters and list applications for the more common members of each class.

8. Use structure and physical and chemical properties to explain selected characteristics of organic compounds, optical isomerism, melting points, boiling points, and reactions.

9. Name and explain the structures, characteristics and applications of selected carbohydrates within monosaccharides, disaccharides, and polysaccharides.

10. List several classes of lipids and explain the structural characteristics of fats and oils, as well as describe the preparation of soaps and detergents and action in the cleaning process.

11. Explain the structures of amino acids and how they form proteins. They will be able to distinguish the function and characteristics of primary, secondary, tertiary and quaternary structures in proteins.
12. Understand the concept and structure of DNA and RNA and how the genetic code creates proteins from the base units of RNA.
